This is Wind cave, in Custer county, twally miles nouth of Custer county, twalve miles north of the city of Hot Syrings, in the southern portion of the Bisch hills. This cave is an immense bed of limesione, a be-wildering labyrinth of boxwood, stalac-tite, stalagmite, popoorn, geodes and frontwest. wildering labyrinth of boxwood, stalactite, stalagmite, popcoru, geodes and froatwerk of glistening whitenass, so delicate that at the alightest touch it crumbles in pieces. Prof. tiornhill of the Smithsonian institution says that formation of the cave is nuknown. Other geologists includes the opirion that it is an axinet geyser, perhaps a former outlat for the warm mineral waters which new come to the surface at itot Springs and its vicinity. Some of the formations show the syldence of the formations show the syldence of having been produced by water, a of the formations show the svidence of having been produced by water, a warm minersi water, and some, notably the frostwork, are so delicate that they could not ewe their existence to the action of water, but must have been formed by a vapor which congealed as it struck the limestoms. The cave is formed of finances or cravices, paralleling one another at distances of from 50 to 300 feet apart. These finances range in height from 30 to 100 feet.
